

Certify Your Project Management Future

No matter the global or domestic economic conditions, it is always a good idea to assess your career, your skills and your professional path, and to ensure that you are moving in an upward direction. There is no time like the present to certify your future.

The Institute of Project Management is the only body in Ireland that can directly certify individual project managers against a world class recognised certification programme that has 100,000 professionals in 45 countries. There are currently in excess of 1600 such professionals in Ireland.

While many project management training providers offer programmes of varying standards, they are not validated to professionally certify individuals in the world's two most reputable certification programmes.

In our current, dreadful, economic climate, it is a good time to be proactive about your career. We are continuously advised to “move up the value chain”. One way to do this is to acquire internationally recognised certification in our particular discipline of project management. Such an investment may make the difference when you are looking for employment (domestically or abroad) – or in proving your value to your current employer.

The IPMA four level certification system validates your education and experience, is recognised worldwide and places you in an elite class of practitioners. The four certifications in the family of credentials represent practitioners at varying levels.

How can you judge how competitive you are in the field of project management or to tell if you have the skills to advance? With the IPMA 4 Level certification system, it is easy to see where you are on the project management career ladder.

Having IPMA certification offers credential holders leverage against potential redundancy, improved visibility in the market place and increased employer confidence.

When economic instability creates employment uncertainty, individuals have to ponder their fates, their futures and take positive action. Project management certification enables you to boost your skills and résumé – particularly if your certification is “Best in Class”.
