

Certified Professionals at IPMA Level B

Organisations and business of today need personnel with solid project management competence. Certified project managers know how to deliver with quality, faster and less expensively. The IPMA certification, reviews a portfolio of evidence to assure end-to-end project management grasp. It is performance based and provides standards by which project management performance can be measured. Taking IPMA advanced certification provides confidence to clients that the company can handle the clients' business efficiently and cost effectively. It also provides positive proof that the individual concerned has gained peer recognition of his/her ability to manage projects.

Three recently accredited IPMA Level B professionals – each from radically different sectors - explains the rationale for pursuing this qualification

Peter Cantwell
Railway Procurement Agency

Achieving Level B Certification is important because my experience and success as a Project Manager is formally recognised with an international qualification. The certification process has been a great personal learning experience involving review of my career record of delivering projects of an increasingly more complex nature. In today's competitive business environment having Level B Certification illustrates my practical experience and knowledge which adds value to my skills in the eyes of my employers.

Padraig Mulcahy
Boston Scientific, Galway

Project Management is becoming more important in dealing effectively with the management of change and the successful implementation of new products within organisations. My role within Boston Scientific is to lead platform and breakthrough product development projects, and lead continuous improvement within the project management organisation.

My achievement in attaining IPMA Level B Certification will help promote the profession of Project Management within the Medical Device sector. I hope it will encourage others within the medical device sector to develop their project management skills and select project management as a career path.

Mark Robinson
Microsoft Ireland

During my Project Management career, I have managed projects across a number of countries, industries and cultures. With this experience, I've been fortunate to have had the opportunity to apply my skills as a Project Manager in many different ways, and to continue learning the art of Project Management.

Having now achieved IPMA Level B Certified Senior Project Manager, this formal appraisal of my skills and competencies is an important and portable certification that is recognised worldwide. I can be confident in the knowledge that my IPMA Certification helps validate the skills and level of Project Management expertise that I bring to my customers.
